Learn more about the President’s Commission on Race and Ethnicity and attend a general body meeting this year.

What is PCORE
Established in 1979 by then Emory University President James Laney, the President’s Commission on Race and Ethnicity (PCORE) has a long and commendable history of working toward change within the Emory community. We are grateful to our current University president, James Wagner, and all who support our commitment to maintain and nurture a diverse, enlightened, and respectful community here at Emory.

Meetings Are Open
Any current faculty, staff, and students of the University and its affiliates can attend a PCORE meeting.

PURPOSE of the Commission
The President’s Commission on Race and Ethnicity is a confidential advisory body to the president of the University. Deriving its authority from the president, the commission has the following purposes:

- To make recommendations to the University's president on actions to improve the representation, development and success of the Emory community as it relates to race and ethnicity
- To serve as a forum for discussion and analysis of issues of race and ethnicity on campus and of national import
- To develop and support programs and activities pertaining to issues of race and ethnicity that will strengthen the entire Emory community
- To review available data and advise on implications for the status of race and ethnicity at Emory
- To support the principles of equal-opportunity based on the University’s Affirmative Action Plan
